

In the video, the POST (Power-On Self-Test) card displays changing hexadecimal POST codes as the motherboard checks each hardware component during startup. When the boot process stops, the last code shown indicates the hardware test where the system failed. This helps the technician identify the faulty component, such as the RAM, CPU, or BIOS, without the computer successfully booting. The POST card makes troubleshooting faster by pinpointing the stage at which the motherboard encounters an error.